Courses Taught

- Foundations of Inquiry in Natural Science (Honors)*: an undergraduate introduction to basic concepts underlying inquiry in the natural sciences; students are taught distinctions between general approaches to inquiry—natural history, analysis, experimentation, creating phenomena—and, through a series of interview assignments and field trips, about the sites and activities of scientists. (Taught with the aid of Catherine Murphy, Department of Chemistry and Biochemistry, University of South Carolina, South Carolina College Course 285A).
- The Gift, On the Philosophy of Exchange (Honors & Graduate Seminar versions)*: a seminar devoted to issues of gift exchange; readings taken from anthropology, sociology, history and philosophy. (University of South Carolina, South Carolina College Course 485; Philosophy 761).
- Philosophy of Technology (Honors)*: an undergraduate introduction to issues in the philosophy of technology; students are taught to appreciate relations between technology, science and society through a discussion of readings in the history and philosophy of technology and through a series of field trips to examine local sites of technological importance. (University of South Carolina, South Carolina College Course 380).
- Ethics of Science and Technology*: an undergraduate introduction to the interaction between ethical judgements and scientific research; case studies include the recombinant DNA debate of the 1970s, the development of nuclear weapons, and intelligence testing research. (University of South Carolina, Philosophy 317).
- History and Philosophy of Science*: an undergraduate introduction to the philosophy and history of science; particular attention paid to the contributions of Hempel, Popper, Kuhn, Lakatos and Hacking. (University of South Carolina, Philosophy 315).
- Philosophy of Science*: an advanced undergraduate and graduate seminar covering several related topics including: instrumentation, explanation, causality, the role of mathematics and logic, measurement, determinism, reductionism, and the place of history in science. (University of South Carolina, Philosophy 512).
- Philosophical Foundations of Nursing Science*: a graduate course taught to first year Nursing Science Ph.D. students on the variety of views held by philosophers about science. (University of South Carolina, Nursing 800).
- Introduction to Inductive Inference*: an undergraduate introduction to methods of inductive inference emphasizing statistical inference. Honors: an undergraduate introduction to the history and foundations of statistical inference and the nature of probability. (University of South Carolina, Philosophy 111).

Introduction to Philosophy: an undergraduate introduction to philosophy; course taught as a large lecture course with smaller discussion sub-sections led by graduate teaching assistants. The course covers the history of philosophy. (University of South Carolina, Philosophy 102)
