

Simple Religion

(9) Summer F.

Text. Micah, 6.⁸ And what doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God."

In our best moments, when we see most clearly into the inner workings of our life, I fancy that we all feel certain that to us at least the religious life is a simple natural life, and I imagine that we all try to formulate into a concise fitting expression our idea of the simplicity and naturalness of the religious life.
The president of our own University, in one of his characteristic expressions, has clothed the idea very simply in saying that "the religious life is an ethical life vitalized by love." One cannot help feeling that the idea back of those words is the same idea that you and I see clearly enough at times, and the same idea that the prophet micah is expressing in these words, "and what doth jehovah require of thee but to do justly, to love kindness, and to ~~walk~~² humbly with thy God". (These two simple expressive statements give expression to essentially the same idea.) The one statement was made 700 years before the birth of Christianity; the other was made within a year. Each finds a response and in our heart, and is but an echo of the voice of the ages in moments of cleanness.

Generation after generation, age after age the human heart has been trying to ~~adequately express~~ in outward form this single idea that the religious life is a simple life.

But there is a strange inconsistency about it all. Each statement says that the religious life is simple, but each implies that in the active world of activity, our simple conception of religious life is buried deep beneath a mass of mystery and immorality. We have to confess that this implied condition is a fact, not only of the earlier days of but of one our generation. In the minds of by far the greater fraction of our people, religion is a mysterious, immaterial factor of our life, about which people may talk, but about which they actually know nothing. There is a strange inconsistency here, we are permitted to see the truth of such a single statement, but we allow ourselves to go and do otherwise. It seems almost as if we were weak to do the things that we would not and forced into doing the things that we would. Sixty seven hundred years ago the prophet Micah said, "What doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God." Could any one state more clearly, were beautifully, were forcefully,⁴ the simple idea that we like to think is the essence of the Religious life.

3.

And yet we have done strange things in the meantime, and we are still doing strange things, whose only result can be to alienate our conceptions of religion from our daily life, and force them apart as things to be attended to at particular times and in particular places. The growth of creeds, the accumulations of tradition about the personality of Jesus, the development of the hierarchy of the Catholic church the washing of a book by the protestants, the speculative dogmas of theologists; how mude! how foreign! how inconsistent all these things seem in the light of the simple words of the old Hebrew prophet!
How unnatural they seem to us in in the face of that cherished idea of religious simplicity. But they are facts, nevertheless. So far away from that simple truth have we wandered that to day, in spite of all our boastings to the contrary, it still remains true that religion is regarded as mysterious, and mysterious, and the religious institutions which ought to command the highest respect are looked upon with contempt by many noble people, and the problem of the Church is becoming ^{more} threatening. That worry lose heart, and are willing to give up the fight.

What is the cause of this circumstance? Why do we see the simple truth, and yet ignore it? There can be but one cause in any inconsistency We are inconsistent, because we are insincere, because we are not truthful, because we are not frank.

Let us try to make clear what I mean.
 We cherish and ^{reverence} ~~have~~ our great heritage of knowledge and institutions; we honor and praise the noble personalities who have been important factors in developing the civilization which we enjoy.

We realize how dependent we are upon all the past, and we do well to guard carefully these sacred things that have been transmitted from generations to generations until we hold them in trust.

But even in this honor, even in this reverence for the past we are often to some degree of insincerity and untruthfulness. One for only to think of the manner in which we 7 treat the great men of a recent generation, yes, even of our own day to realize this truth. Until within a very few years our great father Washington has been so enveloped with legend and fiction, that we well nigh lost the real man. We may be charged with insincerity and dishonesty when we allow our conceptions of so noble a man to become so distorted and fermented that a writer sees fit to publish a book entitled "The true George Washington." If I have any adequate idea of the real nobility of the man, I am sure that he would condemn any trace of untruthfulness which might be involved in our conceptions of him. If we are to pay a just tribute to his worth, and honor him sincerely we must discover the true man, and not construct a false one. Another very obvious illustration of this change was seen in many of the addresses and lectures delivered recently on the life and work of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Many of the lectures, indeed, were very frank and open in presenting to us the real Emerson, but one has to admit that others were almost disgusting in their attempts to picture him in terms not altogether truthful and honest.

If there was one thing upon which Emerson insisted, it was truth. If we would do him justice perfect, we must know the real Emerson.

These two illustrations make clear I hope what I want to say. We do not deal honestly with the great men of the past.
We cloth them with an authority which they never had, and do not question the truthfulness of their utterances. It is this kind of insincerity and untruthfulness

9.

which is keeping religion enveloped in its clouds of mystery and untruthfulness. It is this sheer kind of insincerity and untruthfulness that is keeping religion apart from daily life, and forcing men of deep religious natures to declare against religion.
If I rightly estimate the spirit of those men they would say to us. "We have been truthseekers, and if we have found a truth we are thankful, and are gratified in the honor you pay us. You are truth seekers.
If you find truth in our lines, take it, but if you find error there, in the name of the common humanity for which we have worked, in the name of God whom we love cast it aside."

Indeed this same insincerity is with us in dealing with institutions which are a part of our heritage of the past. In spite of the fact that we boast of our freedom from trach-tins, and assert that we have cast aside all the needless outward forms that in their day seemed to express religious ideas, it still remains true that in the eyes of most people the religious life is looked upon as mysterious and unnatural.

10

We have not been entirely honest in casting aside the old shell that once contained a truth. We fondly assert that no longer do we regard the church as a necessary piece of mechanism, though more mysteries we may become one of Gods elect. We claim to have cast aside that dogma, and yet many of our churches require a statement of belief of such proportions, that not a few deeply religious souls would be excluded.
We still carry along with us a part of the old shell which we say has been discarded. The result is we have a church out of Gods elect, but of ours elect.

The idea of the church as a place of worship is¹⁷ a survival of the old mythical conception that the gods like men had particular dwelling places. We say that we have cast aside that idea. We certainly affirm that we worship God not in a place, but in our lives. That God is ever present, and by noble thought, and noble deed is God worshipped. Every place is therefore a place of worship. But as a matter of fact, while we may be most worshipful in our churches, the moment we get outside of them, we no longer bear the same spirit. We desecrate the work that we do. By doing it poorly, we desecrate our place of business by being discontent, we desecrate our fellow men, the true temples of God, by our relations with them. If we really believe that God is in everything, and that we are in touch with him every woment of our times, why are we not live accordingly?

12

We are bold enough to say that the Church is an association of men trying to help each other to lead a good future life.
But you know and I know that those who have sinned, and sinned deeply, get a cold shoulder in most of our churches.
We are still the saved elect.

I am not saying these things to be critical and pessimistic, but simply to show that we are not so sincere and honest in dealing with our heritage as we sometimes imagine we are. I am certain that those who have been important influences in developing these institutions would urge us to be more frank and more sincere. They would urge us to accept only what is of value to our higher life, and ~~this card~~ all else.
Let us try due respect ^{to their institutions} for their usefulness in giving expression to an idea of an earlier age. But let us take the idea and cloth it to suit our own needs and conditions. I hope that I have made myself clear in what I mean when I say that the strange inconsistency between what in our best moments we understand religion to be, and what in our actual life we show it to be, is due to a persistent insincerity and untruthfulness. It is this insincerity that envelopes religion in mystery.

But to go back from whence we started in spite of appearances to the contrary, I still believe that ^{the} deepest conception of religion is fully expressed by Micah. "What doth Jehovah require of thee but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God." That is an idea of a simple religious life, and to 14.

free ourselves as much as possible from external forms, and to interpret that simple truth in terms of our daily life, is our first interest to-night.

In the language of today I fancy that morality in its broad sense would cover the meaning of doing justly. To do justly would be to lead a life in accordance of with well established ethical principles. One would have a clear consciousness between right and wrong, and would live the right. He would recognize the rights of others, and act accordingly.

To live what we call a straightforward manly life, faithful in the performance of duties, brave in time of danger, sincere and frank in our relations with each other. That I fancy, is what you and I mean by doing justly. That is the kind of life we are trying to lead like, or at least it is the kind of life that would like to live, and that we expect others to live. It is the standard of our social, commercial and private life. We may not realize it, but it is ^{the standard of measure} the standard of measure of daily living.

15.

did not Nichol wear essentially the same thing. So also ~~justly~~ is to measure the truly moral life by the standard of our moral ideal. It is simple, natural, no one can dissent from that. Everyone would wish to be religious and would turn the religious life so far as doing justly is concerned. Everyone believes it

Life would be weak and mechanical if it consisted only in doing justly. The warmth and color, and variation and beauty of our life is in the fact that we also love kindness. Just as the sun coming up above the eastern horizon in the morning disfels the cold and darkness, bringing out the beauty of the world, and abiding upon it at first over dry ground all its life, and passing into the west in the evening, leaves behind a world of glory and splendor, so this love of kindness coming into our early childhood disfels the darkness of duty, brings out into prominence the beauties of our character, enriches and enlivens our woodsy of life, and passing on into the night of death leaves, ^{the monument} one deed behind enveloped in a world of glory and splendor.

It is this love of Kindness that tempers the cold hard realities of life in terms of its woful ideals. A young boy finds that his place = man in life is very greatly increased by doing some little thing to bring a smile of appreciation from his mother. That is small, but it is the rising of the sun of Kindness, and it makes the hard clothes stand out in a new light. He then cheer cheerfully and willingly things that before would have been insurmountable. Just this single beginning becomes the impetus to to an ever widening circle of people for whom he loves to do a kindness, not for the sake of the appreciation, but for the sake of the fervor. So when love it becomes the ruling passion, his power in character, inspiration in struggle, his courage in danger, carrying him through hardships of life, and filling his old age with glory and splendor.

So love Kindness is the single natural touch of the divine in each human soul. Even the meallest of God's children show that to them also it is given to love kindness. Somewhere sometime the soul of the most degraded finds at times into nobility ^{and beauty} under the warming rays light of this divine heritage. It is ^{as} simple and natural as the shining of the sun. To love kindness is endowment of all. There is no mystery about it.

Finally, the old prophet exhorted us to walk humbly with our God. This is the truth that suffice = ments all, that reaches down deep into our souls and lifts us and transfigures us in glory. The sun = face of our lives may be filled with short and perplexity, hardship and pain, we may have periods when it seems as if we absolutely ignore the existence of God, but down deep in the steady, ^{undisturbed} under current of our life there is the deep conviction that in and through all there is the guiding hand of an intelligent loving God. Just as in our own life, ^{with its} defeats and its victories its joys and its pains, with its evidences of weakness and strength, we are conscious that there is a deep undercurrent which seeks its realization in a higher and better life, so in the world with all its misery and suffering, with all its pleasures and trifles, with its periods of apparent decay and inactivity, we are even certain that there is a deep far seeing power guiding it towards a better and nobler life for man. However far we may go astray in our doubts, we come back in the end to the single conviction that in and through all all the marvels and wonders of nature, in and through all the intricate workings of the human soul there is ever present the form of the all powerful God. Deep beneath all the turmoil of life is the guiding hand of a loving Father.

18

That is the eternal truth that is common to us all, and the truth that can transform life into ~~single~~^{life} a life of single devout worship & in all our thoughts and in all our deeds.

To do firstly, to love kindness, and to walk humbly with our God is the single religion that transforms the screws of living into the art of life, that unites all the souls of men into one common fellowship with each other and with God, and links our lives to God's eternity.

Shall we not live the single religious life sincerely and devoutly?

Dinner is full there some all night and now we full bus. See E.C. Dees after a speech in April no right no. about we are to follow street in

Hom. 2

I was reading out at, getting out of spare time in long weather get used about so expect answer from full visible when full, I go to it this will now as the new go down at the big time bus into the time followed placed and at said we think best among other things all and then our book of music and general stuff