

Thomas Paine, and Theology without the Church.

In studying any development of religious thought, or any other movement for that matter, there is always a danger of becoming too narrow in the range of material. We make use of, and in neglecting, the strong side lights which may be thrown upon the movement by the investigation of that material which seems to lie just outside the limits of the Centre. So many, I suppose, Thomas Paine would hardly be regarded as an enriching source for material upon theological subjects. Yet, in spite of his errors, in spite of the many mistakes that Paine made in his theological writings due to his lack of knowledge and culture. in spite of the occasional traces of coarseness, and crudeness, he struck at the very heart of many of the followers that ^{have} flexed many minds since his day.² and the best and most scholarly results of modern historical investigation have gone to confirm and fix many of the statements made by Paine. Even the conservative religious thinkers accept more parts of the new volume than made Paine write his "Age of Reason", than Paine ever dreamed of. They still retain a semblance of belief in those ideas which Paine's greater personal independence lead him to reject.

While the fogs that were written in denunciations of Paine and his ideas have long since been forgotten, the essential truths for which Paine stood have received the approval of history, and are in many ways in complete accord with modern thought.

Born in the year, England, June 29, 1737. he lead a turbulent life ~~to~~ filled with bitter disappointments, until that he ³ came to America in 1773, bringing as his passport into American life, a letter written by Benjamin Franklin. In 1776 he wrote his famous, and what proved to be his sensational "Common Sense", in which he boldly announced that separation from the mother country was the only method of dignity or safety in solving the pressing problem which confronted the colonies in those days. Then followed the numbers of the "Crisis," which were well accepted to the problems of the day. He remained in this country until 1787, when he went to France and England to exhibit a model of a bridge he had invented. Arriving in France he found the people just on the point of breaking into the revolution, and entered into the revolutionary movement, being of a less fanimote and extreme nature than the leaders of the Revolution, as seen particularly in his voting for the King's banishment, rather than for his death, he was thrown Luxemburg Prison. On his way to Prison he put into ~~the~~ the hands of a publisher the first part of ^{his} "Age of Reason." The second part was finished in 1795; The book was dedicated to ~~the~~ the American People, and the demand there was for it, and the extent to which it pervaded the country, which was laying for some quickening nourishment to relieve it from the ~~death of~~ death of spiritual force brought about by Calvinism is clearly set forth in the following words of John White Chadwick. "The age of Reason, letters, fragments, every thing that he ever wrote of a theological character, does not wake of three hunched foges. A little craft! and yet⁵ it has outlined storms in which whole fleets of of seventy four have gone to wreck, and still keeps the seas and fires its saucy challenge across many a founder: our won: of: war and fearful merchantmen.

Seldom have these hunched foges lived so long, and gone so far, and had so large an influence whether for good or for evil.
In the last years of the eighteenth century and in the first years of the nineteenth, they were widely read in England and America. They raised up hosts of advocates in every town and village, worthy hard-headed men with little poetry or imagination in them, and little pity, whatever of sound morality. They were hated to the revolting confines of civilization. They penetrated to the revolting confines of civilization. The wondering feller carried them in his pack to the back-⁶ woodsman in his cabin. And they still sell, especially in the Great West, hundreds and thousands of them every year, and are still widely read with various degrees of satisfaction."

This is a more operative estimate of Paine's theological influence, than he has at times been accorded. For example on the fly leaf of the copy of the Age of Reason which is in the library here, are written these words, "It is bitterly to be deplored, that the genius which formed 'Common Sense,' 'the Crisis' and 'Rights of man' should have ever befouled itself with the obscenity and ribaldry of the 'Age of Reason' and similar books."

One young Methodist preacher arriving in this country from England, expressed himself in these words. "I thank God that the bones of Lou Paine have been ⁷ rooted up, and no longer disgrace the soil of our country," I cannot refrain also from quoting the following which is a master piece of inconsistency. She writes is speaking of Westchester County. "Here is found the delight for villages where the pious but persecuted Huguenots, fleeing from oppressions of bigotry and intolerance, found a quiet and happy home: and where too is still pointed out the consecrated little enclosure, in which when the toil and sufferings of this life were over, they rested from their labors.

And here, alas! that the place should be known but to be shunned, - here is yet seen the ruins of the sad and forsaken spot rendered infamous by the selfishness of the infidel Paine."

Works of J. Paine. Pub. by Wm.
Carey 1830 Preface P XII

But really what is there in this "Age of Reason" & that brought upon the heels of its writer the denunciations of the Christian Community?

Nothing so very startling after all. I quote his statement of belief, at least its positive side.

"I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life.

"I believe in the equality of man; and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to waken our fellow creatures to it."

His conception of God was far more noble and exalted than the notions prevailing among the rank and file of the clergy who condemned him, and his faith much more sound and unassailable. Why he was ever spoken of as an infidel one cannot see, unless it be because he really struck home at the vulnerable joint in the accepted faith of the clergy. 9

The following sentence gives us at once a clue to the cause of the unsympathetic treatment which he received at the hands of the clergy, and also shows us the loftiness of his ideas concerning Jesus.

"The Christian Theory is little less else than the idolotry of the ancient Theologists, accorded to the purposes of power and revenue; and it yet remains to reason and Philosophy to abolish the awful and fraudulent."

Nothing that is here said can apply, even with the most distant disrespect, to the real character of Jesus Christ. He was a mixture, and an amiable one. The morality that he preached and practised was of the most benevolent kind; and through similar systems of morality had been preached by Eurpucius, and by some of the Greek Philosophers, many years before, and by the Greeks since, and by many good men in all ages, it has not been exceeded by any "

A very just, and appreciative statement of Jesus, and one which has the merit of being quite free from gush.

Thus it seems that in general Sam Paine held views which are very acceptable to day to a very large number of people, and one can express these views without fear of such painful criticisms as were poured on Paine.
The ideas which he advanced, represented the opinions of large numbers of people outside of the church. They have to a very large extent been taken up into the church beliefs and represent the liberal branches of almost all religious bodies, as well as the ideas of those who are openly and avowedly liberal. "11

^{Just} As only do these ideas represent the religious opinions of the American movement outside of the church, but they are the essential principles upon which the American Government was founded, I quote "The religious opinions of Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin and a host of other wise and good men in Europe and America, differ in no respect from those of Stow or Paine." With these men Paine was intimate, and in connection with them did most to organize and launch this United States of America. upon her course, defending not only political freedom, and religious toleration but insisting upon religious freedom, and the right of private interpretation of religious experience. When we read in our constitution, - "but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States," it represents the influence of men who were in hearty and cordial sympathy with the ideas of natural religion, which were fundamental with the men of former who framed our constitution,

This current of religious thought, outside of the church is one of the most important, if not the most important in the religious development of the country, and the fulfillment of its prophetic character is being demonstrated each day of our national life.
