Some Social Reflections by A. M. Stewart with a Dedication

L. P. Putnam & Sons 1921.

Introduction.

"Folly, not vice, is the enemy. Our cure is not original sin but original stupidity."

The object of this book is to convince people of two truths hitherto obscured by tolerance and careless thinking — the danger of folly; the value to a liberal State of a solid Aristocracy."

Chap. I. Principles of the Commonwealth.

"Not by the triumphs of the battlefield and the former vice the Commonwealth seek to be justified."

but by the character, and the influence, the noble ex-² ample and the inspiring memory of its men and women."

"That is to say, the meaning of England is neither imperial China nor state slavery, but world character. She is the very antithesis of Prussianism, and the very antipodes of Bolshevism. Her strength, power, and dominion lie in no machinery of state,
but in the world character of her individual citizens."

"England, still for a part of her ideal, stands in a world of many diverse doctrines, and a world at many different levels of civilization, for Liberty & Character."

But how is forbim measuring up to these requirements of liberty & character

Chap II^{III}: "Colonel Rofington's Diaries" and Chap. I & II: Mrs. Arguith's Autobiography. -

Both reveal a cynical flattery, a lack of inward earnestness" as compared with Mrs. Blackstone, a Blackstone, of the Victorian period,

Effect of this Life of Forbim on the nation is very great and very bad. The fault runs deep.

See chapter on Manners, Chap. VIII.

"We possess in place of an aristocracy of culture a forceful and cynical plutocracy which is or wholly given to the worship of Mammon, or any votive of heathen times." P. 122.

He (the Englishman) calls it very good manners to dress lovelly, to talk at the top of the voice, to make a display of jewellery, to conduct the household strictly,
to be faithful, noisy, extravagant, showy and boisterous!

It runs deep,

Chapter XI - Conclusion.

In the course of this essay I have advanced certain propositions which may be summarized as follows:-

"Fashion, because of its conspicuous position in the State, exercises the greatest of all influences on the nation."

"The influences of modern Fashion are injurious to the peaceful evolution of the British Commonwealth, being the influence of ostentation, self-indulgence, lawlessness, cynicism, and frivolity."

"The influence of Iniquity is not to be so greatly feared by the nation as the influence of Folly."

"It is by the domestic door, rather than the economic, that violence enters the state."

"The social, political, and moral health of a community depends mainly upon its attitude towards life, that is to say, its theory of existence."

"In a rational theory of existence it is impossible to divorce time from its context of eternity, place from its context of infinity, man from his context of evolution.

"at the head of a nation there should be an aristocracy of intelligence whose manner of life exhibits the truth of this theory."

A book with a sense of the reality of word values, but confuses word forms with the word character. (See chof. VII.) The forms of an passing generation, the victorian age appeal to the author, quite regardless, it would seem of their real ethical content, and yet he realizes that some law every act, and every person is measured by ethical standards.

The Glass of Fashion

"And when I came to the last page of this long fidgrimage through Vanity Fair, (Margot Asquith out of sight) which nevertheless leaves so much to be said, I found the following passage:

"An unpettered childhood and triumphant youth;
a lot of love-making and a little abuse; a little fame
and more abuse; a real man and great toffiness;
the love of children and seventh heaven; an early death and a crowded memorial service."

“Mr. Arguith drew up a summary of her history and her aspirations. The last of those aspirations was for ‘a crowned memorial service’: Miss Lady Frances Balfour defended the vulgarity of some which inspired that aspiration. Is there not in this passion for a last crowd, as it were a last audience, something that strikes us in the depths of our nature worse than the sins of the weak and the uneducated?”

“Much is to be learned from that flattery.”

Does it not witness to an immense desolation x 2 of the woman's heart? She does not dare to be alone with herself even in the grave. She would have the fashionable world, and the photographers of the illustrated papers, as near her coffin as burial will permit. As the tree falls, so would it lie. As she has sown, so would she reap. What vulgarity.

"If there is one great and controlling principle Page 124.
in the behavior of the average good Englishman it is the principle of reserve."

"This virtue is not always the highest virtue of modesty; but it makes for that virtue. The characteristic Englishman does not adventure either his position or his possessions.
He calls it very bad manner to speak loudly, to talk at the top of the voice, to make a display of jewellery, to conduct a house hold ostentatiously, to be fresh, pale, noisy, extravagant, stony, and brazen; these things he regards as bad form. They are no temptations for him. They are distasteful.

These vulgar people have used money to advertise their wares, and now would use the money made by that advertisement to advertise themselves. The stop mischievous is transferred from commercial to social life. Reserve in business would be ruin.
Reserve in social life would be suicide. As they attracted the public to buy their goods, so they would attract aristocracy to a knowledge of their arrival in Vanity Fair. They advertise their existence by hanging their women with jewels, by building palatial houses, and by giving entertainments which in every detail flash wealth in the eyes of their favorite guests."

manner.

"Consider their scope, then, their way of life, their habits, their manner, the very tones of their voices; look at them attentively; observe the literature they read, the things which give them pleasure, the words which come forth out of their mouths, the thoughts which make the furniture of their minds; would any amount of wealth be worth having with the condition that one was to become just like these people by having it?"

Matthew Arnold.

"It is the unconscious, rather than the conscious, which is the important factor in personality and intelligence. The unconscious furnishes the formative material out of which our judgements, our beliefs, our ideals, and our characters are shaped."
