Subject,; Ex)President Eliot as a religious Thinker.

Last Sunday I tried to present to you the inter-pr pretation of religious experience from the point of view of one who has made it his life work to study and think concerning the great revolutionary changes that are going on in our ideals and fundamental principles. Prof. Foster may be regarded as one of the few men ingaged in this line of work, who understands the tendencies and movements of thought to day. If one wishes to understand the real nature of the developement of modern thought, and wishes to find out xxxx in just what direction he is moving I know of no writer of the day who can do more for him than Prof. Foster. He speaks from the point of view of the theologian and philosophical tninker.

This morning I want to present to you for your consideration the point of view of a layman, whose wide knowledge and administrative experience, as well as his profound thought, gives to his utterances a great significance. Mr. Holmes presented to you the ethical bearing of his lecture and its prophetic utterance concerning the work of the Khuk churches in the social economy of the future, pointing out in no uncertain language the fact that the churches have to do with the conditions of human lafe in this world in which we live. But this emphesis upon the work of the social and economic conditions, to which Mr. Holmes calls your attention, is simply an evidence, or rather a manifestation of a wider and profoundly revolutionary change that is going on in our time thatxemexxemxxemxxemxxemxxemxxem, - a revolution in our whole thought concerning man, the universe, and the significance of humsn life. There is not a custom, an institution, or a tradition in the whole range of the social and the intellectual, and moral economy of human life that is not touched by this new movement of which Pres. Eliot speaks. In all its various manifestations, intellectual, ethical, political, social, asthetic, we are witnessing the unfolding of a new dispensation, a new social order with new purposes and new values. It carries with it the power that shall dispel the older civilization, so that we shall know no more of it than we know of the old nomadic life of the semetic people, who three or four thousand years ago roamed the plains and hills of Asia, or of the barbarian civilization of our Teutonic ancestors, who a thousand or fiftenn hundred years ago were rescued the gleanings of a mernying civilization from the Ruxus tottering ruins of antiquity.

The significance of this lecture by Dr. Eliot becomes more pronounced when we consider the setting of it.
The course of lecture arranged for the summer session of the Harvard Divinity school, of which the lecture in question was the last, grew out of a long held conviction on the part of those who arranged it, that the developements of modern life are working a profound and far reaching revolution in our whole social economy, and that the real vital moral and religious thinking of our time is being done outside of the ecclesiastical institutions. Wishing, therefore to developement of this change, the course of lectures was arranged. The plan was to reach out into all the significant activities of modern thought, and life, and bring together lines of influence that point in the direction of moral and religious interests. At the resk of being tiresome, I am going to point out the way this plan was carried out. The first group of lectures be historians, dealt with the causes of and the historical illustrations of religious fluctuations.

The second group of lectures had to do with present religious conditions in the various countries of Europe/and . It each case the lecturer pointed out the fact that traditional religion, for various ethicaland intellectual reasons, is in going through a process of decay. Whereever the influence of modern ethical and social idealism is being felt, the work ecclesiastical machinery is failing to meet the situation, and is consequestly failing to do its proper work in thes reconstruction.

Under the third group of lectues contemporary moveme ments were considered. In psychology, Prof. Munsterberg gave two lectures on psychotherapy. Prof. Parker followed with four lectures on the present state of theories of evolution. These lectures were followed a series of lectures on the religious aspect of knextanaxamaxamax present social movements especially the labor movement. Then followed four lectures on the religious implications of contemporary Philosophydealing with Naturalism, Idealism, Pragmatism, and the new realism. following these were two lectures on the present scientific attitude towards matter and ether; two on the principles and methods of bibical criticism, and two on the effect of new testament criticism on modern religious life and thought. This third group of lectures were dealing, as you see, with prest movements of modern life, and presented a very comprehensive survey of modern thought and activities.

Then followed six lectures on religious conditions and prospects in the United States. The whole course was completed by the remarkable address of Dr. Eliot. I have in taken this time in outlining the course in order to show that his lecture is not important, bnot alone because it presents the opinion of a prominent man, but also because it really states the convictions of a great international religious movement. It has nothing whatever to do with sects or denominations, but it voices the religious and ethical purposes of the times.

With this as a background, I want to present briefly hai point of view. You will find quite a full abstract of the lecture in this month's issue of the calendar.

A short protion of the address is devoted to showing what the religion of the future will not be, i.e. in pointing out the non-essentials of form that are being sloughed off in the process of reconstruction. This negative side is presented under seven heads.

"First the religion of the future will not be based on authority, either spiritual or temporal. The decline of the reliance upon muxhwakky absolute authority is one of the most significant phenomena of the modern world. This decline is to be seen everywhere, - in government, in education, in the church, in business, and in the family. The present generation is willing, and often eager to be led; but it is averse to being driven , and it wants to understand the grounds and sanctions of authoritative decisions.

Second in the religion of the future there will be no pesonifications of natural forces, and thi rd there will by be no worship of ancestors, and no identification of any human being, however majestic in character, with the Eternal Deity. Fourth in the religious life of the future the priamry object will not be the personal welfare or safety of the individual in this world or any other. The religious person will not think of his own safety or welfare, but of the contribution to the common good. Fifth Itywill not be sacreficial, an attempt to purchase the favor of some god, but it will purify itself of these barbarous ideas.

Sixth the religion of the future will not perpetuate the Hebrew antropomorphic idea of God, It will not think of God as an enlarged glorified man, who walks in the garden in the cool of the day. The nineteenth century has made all of these conceptions of God look archaic and crude.

and 7th. The religion of the future will not be gloomy, ascetic or maledictory, It will not deal cheifly with sowwow and death, but with joy and life. When its disciples encountet wrong and evil in the world, his impulse will be to search out its origin, source, or cause, that he may attack it at its starting point.

So much for the nagations. They are very swweping, and in thier realization we shall see many existing customs, and institutions swept into the rubbish heap. Let us take due care that we do not hinder and prevent this cleaning process.

But we now come to the positive aspects of this xxxx presentation, touching first the inem idea of God from the point of view of modern thought. " The twentieth century religion will acceet letterally and implicitely St. Paul's Statement," In him we live, and move and have our being." "God is so absolutely immanent in all things, animate and inanimate, that no midiation is needed between him and the least particla of his creation. In his moral attributes, he is for every man the multiplication to infinity of all the noblest, tenderest, and most potent qualities which that man has ever seen or imagined in a human being. In this sense every man makes his own picture of God. Every age, barbarous or civilized, happy or unhappy, improving or degenerating, frames its own conception of God within the limits of its own experiences and imaginings. In this sense, too, a humane religion has to waite for a humane religion has to wait for a humane generation. The central thought of the new religion will therefore be a humane and worthy idea of God, thoroughly consistant with the ninetenth century revelations concerning man and nature, and with all the tenderest and lovliest teachings which have come down to us from the past.

But if God is so thoroughly immanent in the entire creation, there can be now secondary causes", in either the material or spiritual universe. The new religion rejects absolutely the conception that man is an alien in the world. It rejects absolute entire conception of man as a falel being, hopelessly wicked and tending downward by nature. and it makes this imphatic rejection of long accepted beliefs because it finds them all inconsistant with a humane, civilized, or worthy idea of God."

The religion of the future will pay homage to all rightous and loving personswho in the past have exemplified and made inelligent to their contemporaries, intrinsic goodness and effluent good-will ... It will treasure up tales of human excellence and virtue. It will reverance the discoverers, teachers, martyres, and aposteles of liberty, purity, and rightousness . It will respect and honor all strong and lovely human beings. In this simple natural faith there will be no place for metaphysical complexities, or magical rites, much less for obscure dogmas, the result of compromises in turbulent conventions. The new religion will animate and guide ordinary men and women who are putting into practice religious conceptions which result directly & from their own observations, and precious experience of tenderness, sympathy, trust, and solemn joy. It will be most w welcome to the men and women who cherish and exhibit incessant, all comprehending good- will. These are the good People.

"To the wretched, sick, and downtrodden of the earth, religion has in the past held out hopes of future compensation. When ... For presnt human ills , however crushing , the widely accepted religions have offered either a second life, presumably immortal, under the happiest conditions, or at least peace, rest, and a happy oblivion. " The religion of the future will approach the whole subject of evil from another side, that of resistance and peevention. XXXXXXXXXXXX Its priests will be men especially trained in the best methods of improving social and industrial conditions of life. When peole suffer the mrainary familiar evils caused by overcrowding, impure food, and cheerless labor, the modern true believers contend against the sources of such misery, -they believers contend against the sources of such misery, -they attack the sources of physical and moral evil. The new religion cannot supply the old sort of consoalation by offering rewards for the future, but it will diminish the needs for such consolation by by removing the EXEMPTE preventable causes that produce them. "Working together will be one of its fundamental ideas, - of men with God, of men with prophets, leade rs, teachers, of men with one another, of men's intelligence with the forces of nature. It will teach only such uses of authority as are necessary to secure the co-operation of several property or many people to one end; and the discipline it will advocate will be the training of the co-operative good-will."

Thus the negations and the assertions concerning the present development of religion among us. Thus an indivation of the old clothing of religion that we are casting off, and the patterns of the ne2 that we are cutting, and making ready for use.

"Whether it will prove as efficient to deter men from do-wrong and to encourage them to do right as the prevailing religions have been, is a question which only experience c can answer. In these two respects neither the threats nor *xx the promises of the older religions have been remarkably successful in society at large. The fear of heal has not proved effective to deter men from wrong doing, and heaven has never been described in terms very attractive to the average man or woman. Both are indded unimaginable. The great geniuses , like Dante and Swedenborf, have produced only fantastic and incredible pictures of either state. The modern man would hardly feel any appreciable loss of motive power toward good or away from evil if heaven were burnt or hell quenched. The prevailing Christian conceptions of heaven and hell was have hardly any more influence with educated people in these days than Olympus and Hades have. The modern mind mind craves an immediate motive or leading, good for to-day on this earth The new religion builds on the actual experience of men and women, and of society as a whole. The motive power it relies on have been, and are at work in innumerable lives; and its beatific visions and its hopes are better grounded than those of traditional religion, and finer, because free from selfishness, and the imigery of governments, courts, social dostinctions and war."

Finally this twentieth century religion is not only in to be in harmony with the great secular movements of modern society, but also in essentail agreement with the direct, personal teachings of Jesus, as they are reported in the Gospels. The revelation he gave known to mankind thus becomes more wonderful than ever. "

In this address it seems to me we have a clear and a consise statement of the rought outlines of principles and motives that ax are and shall be the controlling forces in the coming of the new dispensation, in which the beauty and wonder of human life shall become the recognized channels of the divine, in which the co-operative good will among men shall permeate every activity, and every corner of society. By tradition, by conviction, and by joyous goodwill we are dedicated to the unfolding and establishment of this new interpretation of religion in human life and in human society
