Pittsfield, Mass. October 24,1909. Subject, - The spirit of the times.

Daring and hazardous as it may be I have certain convictions and ideas concerning the development of society in these times in which we are living. Three I weeks ago I preached a sermon on the confidence that we may have in the thinking power and the thought product of the amateur thinker. Two weeks ago I presented the point of view of a philosopher, and theologian who, I am sure, embodies in his views the ideas and faith that we are moving towards with such amazing repidity. He is voicing the thought and the point of view of the amateur thinker. His point of view would not be so significant, were it not for the eveident fact in that he speaks not for himself alone, but for thr growing E convictions of our times and and to-morrow. His philosophy of life is the philosophy of the modern world. Last Sunday I presented the point of view of the layman, thinker and man educator, a man who has had influence in developing the scientific thought habits of the life of the nation. Here again the great significance of the utterance was not in the fact that a prominent man uttered it, but in the apparent fact that it goiced the religious convictions of the growing social order which is emerging out of the old. You take the three things together and you have the prophetic indications of the constructive spirit of the times in which we live. They indicate the fundamental character of the extraordinary revolution through which we are passing. In the process of this revolution from the old order to the new we are discarding old standards, old measures of value, old instituions old customs, that belong essentially to the ideals and the new measures of value, new institutions, new customs, such as will interpret the genius and express the purpose of the new order. To those whose standards are of the old order this disintegration of the old is a most gloomy and discouraging spectacle. To those whose bheart is in the new it is full of hope and inspiration, a movement pr gnant with the lofty idealism of a new heaven and a new earth.

But after all this spirit of life wich we call the spirit of the modern world is not so new after all. It is not a wild dream manufactured in the night by some unsophistical cated person, and foistered on thexemperatory an unsuspecting and incapable humanity. It is the growth of centuries. Who shall dare say how long humanity has been at work on it,? Much rather it is the secret purpose of long ages, the thought and the inspiration of great prophetic souls, the wisdom of seers, the dream and the theme of poests, the hope of great leaders in thought and in life. It is the cry of a prodigal humanity which has taken its inheritance, and wondered away from its natural home of human life to waste its substance in riotous living amid the false gods of unreality. In the social order of feudal Europe you can see this prodigal man eating the husks of an unnatural religion, devoid of life, and hope, living upon a dry a barren earth from which he had driven his gods. Hungering and thirsting after life he looked into the heavens and prayed in vain to his gods that lived not nor spake unto him. What a desolate and barren land the mumanity of those days looked out upon .? Every thing that eye could look upon was depraved, the earth and all its beauty was of the devil; men and women with their hopes and aspirations, with their love and passions for life were godless hopeless creatures. Only one ray of hope in all the vast domain and experience of life, and that ray was the tale told them by the church that somewhere in some far off part of space was a god who had sent them sis message of hope throught the channels of the church. Then the sorry spectacle of the church, really the only thing that was vicious and x corrupt. In deed it was a gloomy and barren world, devoid of gods and hope. But humanity in whom there glowed the with fore of the divine life could not always feed upon these dry and juiceless husks of a barren sppernaturalism and sacreme mentalism. So al last its voice was heard crying out for the natural man the natural life. The the rebitth of learning in the rennasance, in the wild a turbulent years of the crusades in the years of seething war and unrest of the reformation, we find the outward expressions of humanity awakaningx repenting, and crying out for life, life, life, for the homeland, where on go's green earth and among the human beings that lived on it, it might once again seek and find the reality for which its soul hungered and thirsted.

Thus we see the beginning of that modern world, whose purposes, whose hopes, whose idealisms, are meet and drink k for us. and the hope and faith for our children. You may to trace the developement of it all through history, stage by state, century by century, men have been making theiray back to the natural man, the natural life, the natural world, with its human hopes, and aspirations, with its human love, and its human joy, its human possibilities and its human limitations. and Lo, we are finding that the gods which could not be found in the far off heavens speak to us from every thing animate and inanimate. The earth becomes alive with the infinete, aid in every human being we see something of the father spirit of life, striving to express itseld in the world of fact and reality. We begin again to say God is in his heaven, and God is in his world, all will be right with man just aw soon as we can clear away this last vistage of that barren superbaturalism, and the institutions that it created.

What I have said will serve to indicate something of attitude and the spirit of the modern world. From its negative point of view it seeks to leave behind all that smacks of that old supernaturalism, and the instituitions of privilege and authority which it created. It seeks to remove and to forget every arteficial barrier that stands in the way of men and women who are striving to acheive the possibilities of human life. There fore, whereever you find and institution that gives privileges to a class or a group, you will find the modern man, wtriving to put that relic of the past onto the rubbish hear where it belongs. It has no place in the growing modern world, and in the life of the modern man and woamn, whose life, whose hope and aspirations, whose purposes, speak of the eternal in the trnascient, and the infinite in the finite.

But the negative spirit and the negative work of the modern world is not the interesting and the commanding xxxx aspect. In the positive and the conscructive we find that which appeals. Its first and fundamental principle is that of democracy. No privileged class, either rulers, or teachers or priests. But in the things which xxxxxx involve a common interest, and are in the nature of a common purpose, there shall be common action. This principle was clearly understood by the leaders who first began to cast off the burdens of *x*

the old world. Jonh Ball, one of the agitators in the means peasants' revolt that broke the back feudalism said as far back as 1365 or 70.-Good people, Ex things will never be well in England so long as goods be not in common, and so b long as there be velliens and gentlemen . By what right are they whom we call lords greater folk than we ? On what xxxx grounds have they derserved it ? Whu do they hold us serffa fage ? If we all came of the same father and mother, of Ada m and Eve, how can they say or prove that they are better than we, if it be not that they make us gain for them by our toil what they spend in their pride. ? They are clothed in velvet and warm in their furs and ermines, while we are covered xx with rags ! They have wine and spices and fair bread; and we have oat-cake and straw, and water to drink. They have leisure and fine houses; we have pain and labour, and the rain and the winds in the fields. And y t it is of us and of out toil that these men hold their estate. " You see how clear cut is the rpinciple there stated. That was the ultimatun delivered by the leaders of the revolt and revolution that makes our freedom to-day as good as it is. Equality. no privileged class. That has been the watchword from that day to this. Democracy, in the affairs of common interest there shall be a common ai and a common purpose. On this principle as a basis has been developed all the evolutionary changes in government forms. A common purpose, and a common capacity, and a common responsibility. With that as a quideing hand you may trace you way through all the history that separates the great age of feudalism and supernaturalism, and privilged classes down to the present, with its tremendous developement towards democracy. If you have followed at all the present day movements in the direction of the extension of the suffgage, you will doscover the same principles and the same argumaants. Witness the movement for squall bullings, by the women citizens. That is clearly and definitely in keeping with the spirit of the modern world, and k the day is not far distant when wankakk we shall see the work of its heroic defenders rewarded with the right of the ballot. The spirit of the modern world demands it . and will acheive it. It is xxx a concrete application of the fundament al principle of the modern world, and is one of the movements of to-day that bears witness to the constructive spirit of the modern world. It is a far journey from the idea of the divine right of kings, and the authority of the church, to the *deal, however imperfectly realized, to a democratic government of the people by the people and for the people. But it indicates the direction in which the modern world is travelling.

But the other principle which manifests the spirit of the modern world, and which these first fruits of the modern spirit understood is the doctrine of work or labor. I x want to take this in its widest sense. That which we have, that which we are is ours only by virtue of labor, by work, by experience. Nothing is given to us free- handed. Our power over nature, our ability and capcity to supply the necessities of life, our grasp of truth, our grasp of life itself is product of labor and unspeakable toil. But before I show how thoroughly and completely this doctrine of labor os parmant permeating, and has permeated our modern life, I want to refer again , as I have before to the writing where it finds its classic early expression. William Langland's Piers the Plowman was written about 1365. He was a contemporary and coworker with John Ball. In this famous poem of his, he has a dream, in which he xex goes sees all the people of the earth in the field between the tower of truth, and the dungeon of care. In this dream he pictures all the social conditions of the times, ecomomic, moral religious. He awakes from this first dream, and soon has another. In the second redream Reason is preaching to the people, They repent and seek to find the tower of truth. But no one is able to lead them there. The prines, and rulers, the church, and the priests are not up to the task. Just at this juncture comes the only man who knows the way to the tower of truth. He is Biers the plowman , a working man, and he does the trick by putting tham all to work . That was a revolutionary doctrine at that time . and in some respects it is to-day. Yet if you stop to think of it you will see that it is at the bottom of all our modern thinking. As an illustration Prof. Foster's book, and President Eliot's lecture both stand on the ground that all our knowledge and wisdom is the product of experience in life. Nothing is given to us ready made in the world of ideas. The e truth that we come to know, the hopes that we come to have, the intelligence that we acheive, the ideals that we cherish every single one of them are gleaned from the universal life in unspeakable toil and labor. Thsi principle of truth gained in experiance, which is at the bottom of all modern the thinking and activity, is but the wider meaning of the mint truth exressed by Riers Langland when he brings forth the workman, Piers the plowman, to lead the lost people to the tower of truth. It is also the doctrine back of the econmoic of socialism and political philosophy/to which I shall refer shortly. Let me quote from Prof? Foster?, -- What is our answer to the Question, What is man? Not the saint of the church, not the Greek or the Roman, not the finished product of the rationalist, not the forest - man and the nature-man, but a task

, an acheivment. Man is not until he becomes. To become means the work of forming, and ordering the personal and the social. Individuality is an endowment, personality is an acquirment; nature-man is a gift, culture- man is task. We are not men, our vocation is to become men. This means the developement of the inchoate into organic life, personal and social. It means the humanization of all animal impulses and passions, the enoblement of all that is rude and vulgar, the culture of all that is raw. To be a man is not to possess by donation the alien goods of thought, but to develope from within a function of thinking of one's own. " Thus dees Prof . Foster tellus that we reach the Tower of & truth by work, we developeinto men and women through experience. We have the gift in our nature man to become men of culture and nobility.

Thus the foundation. Upon this foundation, upon this faith that men have the power to develope and to grow into the highest possibilities of huamn life, we are developing our modern social order. As an illustration of this witness our public school system, in fact our whole system of education, inadequate and imperfect as it is, not alone in its realized products but also in its ideals. The whole system is constructed on the idea that men have the capacity to develope their possibilities, and education is provided that they may the have the more effective tools with which to acheive their end. But I cannot stopto expand this idea.

Now the other side of this principle comes to the front for consideration. The purpose of man is to acheive the highest possibilities of human life, in thought, in aspiration, and in activity. That he has the capacity, as a nature gift, is also the conviction of the modern world. What more

The early modern man saw the pungency of this question, and answered it in his time as we must answer it in our time. He needs freedom and opportunity, said the egitator of early days. The Feudal man cannot hope to become man, because he does not have the opportunity. He spends so much of his time in providing for the luxery and the comfort of a privileged class that he cannot rise above the animal. This has been the answer all the way down through the ages given by those who have contributed to the progress of the social erder. Thsi is the answet that is given by the socialist to-day. He says that so much of the product of the lober , by which men should acheive their manhood, goes to feed and maintain the excessive wealth and luxery of a ppiwileged class that the vast majority of men have not the opportunity of doing that broad work, of having that broad experience that makes for manhood and women hood, and human life. He begins his manhood life with hopes and aspirations, but soon they begin to give way to hopelessness, and despair, and finally all h his possibilities die away in and are buried beneath the grim burden of incessant toil, through which he succeeds wak if he is fortunate in feeding his body that he may continue his zai toil, and in continueing his toil that he may feed his body. So the socialist takes the doctirne that all things are the product of human toil from the lips of the philosopher, and asks the pertinent question, - If all things are the product of human toil, then why is it that but a few have the opportunity of useing those things that humanity produces in its toil. ? His answer is a plain strainghtforward one. There is a privileged class, who get more than they earn, and there is an exploited class who get less than they earn. There is an unqueal opportunity. Let us do away with this inequality of

of opportunity, and in those things which all have shared in producing, let all share in useing, so that men and women m who are overburdened with the toil and drudgery of labor, may have the opportunity of developeing for themselves their own function of thinks, and living in the upper stories of live. All this is strictly in accord with the underlying principles of modern life, and in the developement of the socialist movement we see one of the most characteristic movements of the spirit of our times. It is the attempt to express, and to realize in the industrial world, through the medium of political effort, the rpinciples that have been at the bottom of all the historical developement that separates us from feudal Europe, and its social, intellectical order.

Thus the principles of our time. Equality of opporunity, and the acheivment of truth and life through human effort, inproviding the necessities of life, and in realizing the richness of the hughest possibilities of life. In all our great activities, those whoch make for the extension of the principle of democracy, not alone in politics, but in education, in industry, in art, in music, in literature, in life itself, in hope and aspiration, in philosophy and thought, these are amnifestations of the spirit of the modern world in the life of our times, these are the tasks which our fate fathers, who once fought a good fight for freedom and human life have given us to accomplish. These are the tasks to when which we set oursleves as children of the modern world, who have faith in the natural men, and in the natural life.

The way is not always clear before us, We do not always see the next essentail step, but we have the purpose, and we believe that he that seeks shall find, and to him that knocketh, the door of truth shall be opened. He that has the will shall know the doctrine. We are not anxious for the outcome so long as we face the future, and have our hearts and minds set on the things that shall be, so long as we press forward to the prize of the high calling of God in human nature. These principles of the modern world are our working tools and their incarnation in life is our task, and that work is in the spirit of our times.
